Clubhouse

Please let me in the clubhouse.
I have candy, dirty jokes and magazines of filth.
I may not help your grade point average but I promise to cause it no detriment.
I can help with geometry and algebra, or maybe help you with your piggy bank.

I wear cool clothes and don’t do what I’m told all the time.
But I won’t wear your letters shamefully in public or at the local mall.
I’m different, I know,
but I don’t care about the other clubs.
They’ve always been too willing to let me be a part.

I can lend you secrets of the world you wonder yet only write about.
Why watch movies in avid research?
I can tell you who she is, or who they are,
I can tell you what it feels like and the year of the car her father drives.
I turn to new experiences instead of turning the page of another’s recollection.

Please let me in the clubhouse
and we can play your games.
I’d like to know what’s so special that I cannot come in.
I doubt it’s something I haven’t pondered in anxiety, persona, or voice, nor dreamed a wet dream’s nightmare about or viewed in some porno scene.
All I can offer is perhaps what you don’t want.
Or maybe it is that you’ve wanted it for so long you’ve all given up.
But maybe I hit my social prime in high school.
I just bought another blazer
I’m not sure if it’s your style or mine.
I hope it’s not too cool, I hope it’s not too dull.
I cannot change the way I look, or the way I talk, or my desire to become a member of the only club that I wanted to be part of that wouldn’t let me in.
Under the Stairs

I pass the chemical plant by the trestle on the way home and the smell of sulfur in the air brings me to the back door of the house on Boulder View Drive.
Usually barricaded by a lawn mower, tools, and cases of silver cans with bold black lettering: B-E-E-R—you know, the old ones with the pullback tabs.
Four wooden stairs out to the backyard
we had a fort there,
under the stairs.
We would play with matches, hoard discoveries like old Playboys—that the perv at the card shop sold us—polished rocks, supposed arrowheads, candy, rubber snakes, and fake dog shit.
Our prized possessions were daggers that we made with a bike handlebar grip and a stick sharpened to a dull point on the cement of our blacktop double-driveway, or on one of the large rocks that made our street a dead end.
At school nearby we were told that Indians used them as drums, but now under the stairs, at age nine, they separated the neighborhoods and created rival soccer teams.
We weren’t supposed to go over there or to let anyone in so we stayed away and were told not to talk to strangers even though we knew their kids.
Ryan was nice enough, even though he lived on the other side of the rocks, even though he had to take a different bus to get to school.
We should have let him in.
Maybe then the man at the card shop wouldn’t have got to him.
Hyannis, MA

I was always willing to play the cruel older brother chasing you—two chubby kids running on the pavement, our feet black-bottomed and blistered from never wearing sandals. Remember the peanut butter & jelly sandwiches we had on the way out to the Cape—packaged in tinfoil, teeter-tottering on the edge of the second row seat, that fell victim to the musty sand-covered floor mats of the family caravan. It was your fault that I forgot my glasses—blue, circular lenses, like the ones John Lennon wore; at least that’s what the Phishhead cashier at that store in Provincetown said. I left them in the side compartment of the backseat where you kept your multicolored bouncy balls that we got from the flea market where we stole those novelty pop fireworks you throw at the ground. Maybe you would remember the rusty Chock Full O’Nuts can that we peed in so we didn’t have to stop along the way. I know, well, you’ve got to remember when the cops pulled us over—Dad was pissed. That stupid Dunkin Donuts box we tore apart and threw out the window. Perhaps we should’ve thrown the donuts out instead. I bet you do remember that beach with the huge wooden staircase built right into the dunes. Mom and Dad were proud of themselves having climbed it up and down; they always were overweight. I’m sorry, although at the time it was funny, my wet sandy towel, the crack on your lower back, the people whose necks snapped to look at the awkward chubbiness of our family vacation.
Harold and the Purple Crayon

I look around my cubicle, gray ceiling and manila phone.
I curse the white sterile walls.
Why can’t I draw on them
a purple door that I remember so vividly?
Or fill the electrical socket with green Play-Doh—the patchwork of a child, high in sodium, yum.
To use snots as weapons:
some, when rolled in a ball, release from your finger while others remain stuck.
Likewise dead-or-live bugs in the kitchen or the mysterious scraps of toilet paper you find in the men’s room serve as ammo to throw
at the new girl in accounting.
To make music with your armpits, mimicking farts
with lips to closed hands.
Now is not the same.
Hi-C and Calamine Lotion

It was on a Monday I sat, late for work, in a pediatrician’s office, waiting for my immunization records.

How awkward to sit with mothers and children, sick and crying, with wet diapers, waiting for the prognosis of the latest sandbox plague.

I should have made an appointment or had the doctor fax them.

But there I sat, watching sick school children play Pokemon or whichever non-educational craze swept their elementary schools this week.

One child stood alone.

I watched him play with a plastic multicolored abacus.

His mother hands him a juicebox, green and yellow like Slimer from Ghostbusters.

Although it appeared a gallon in his hands, he took control, wresting the wrapper off the red straw.

How innocent he is, not knowing that straw will earn him detention in later years when he learns the arts of spitballs.

He came toward me and I asked if he could do a tumblesault.

But he bashfully returned to the leg of his mother, his perch to sit and wonder, perhaps,
why he cannot talk to strangers, or perhaps,
how the green elephant on the wallpaper got chickenpox.
Boston Whaler Blues

Can’t we just go fishing?
Take that drive down Route 1 with Allie’s Donuts on the way—glazed crullers and coffee milk.
The smell of our old wood paneled caravan uniformed in once tan interior, carefully littered with beach sand and remnants of youth and wet dog.
It won’t take long once we get to the cottage:
a five gallon bucket with a box of frozen squid,
the green tackle box filled with rusty hooks, steel leaders, four ounce sinkers and expensive lures we’ve never used.

Can’t we just go fishing?
Let’s get farmer tans and just drift like the time we lost the propeller and had to get towed to shore by a jet ski.
You and me on the Whaler, our lines in the water, talking like fathers and sons once did.
Perhaps the fish below are immersed in the same debate:
the son wanting to leave home
to chase the bait;
the father weary,
well aware of the hooks.

You used to take a cooler of beer that we could’ve gotten in trouble for because I was underage.
Now, you can’t have booze on a boat anymore.
It figures that now that I can drink by age we cannot drink on the water.
But maybe that’s why you won’t go fishing.
Indian Rock Farm Road

An aged birdbath serves as an eerie reflection of its once white color, reminded by the flakes and chips of paint strewn about the unkempt lawn, as it splits the symmetry of the backyard. The two paddleboats overturned, tarpaulin-adorned, adjacent to the Sunfish in their resting places of off-season months.

The old wooden swing there between the trees creates a shadowed hideout when the sun is high. How it caused turmoil among siblings and cousins— “Open Sesame,” some could enter. “To the dungeon,” others could not. The chains that supported the swing cost Mark the tip of his youth and backyard football stardom. “Better a finger than his life,” Aunty Laurel said. Severed, it dangled from the chain, forever tainted like the thick rope that hung loosely from the big oak tree.

There, up on the hill, an old couple used to summer there. They were always “discontent with their marriage.” That’s what our parents told us. But we knew something happened. We were told to stay away from that tree, because of its story and all.
As I look up at the ceiling, lights suspended, bulbous,
looking like breasts,
I think of the asbestos-ridden drop-in tiles of my elementary school.
Lost on a school trip,
I panic and scan the stacks,
nine years old again,
dreading another encounter with the drunkard janitor whose ramblings escaped the surgical mask he wore.
Now, fifteen years later,
I think he may fear bird flu, or contracting HIV from the junkie in the bathroom
dishing out blowjobs for a buck.
I’d like to think he actually read those books whose pages he turned so tenaciously with latex-gloved hands.
Maybe he actually knew who Whitman was and that he liked the cock and the idea that Shakespeare’s sonnets were written for a teenage boy—this library literally excites him.
And here I sit and wonder what drove this old man to madness.
Perhaps, we are alike,
and wonder if Whitman would care to know that his leaves are paperbacked and dusty on the bottom shelf.

Our Parade

Last night I made my bed with you under the sheet. Tonight, you’re one-hundred-ninety-three miles away, again. You don’t take up too much space and little comfort is lost in our debate over who will get the “good” down pillow— even though it is mine.

Another night we’ll say our goodnights over the phone and our discourse will consist of your noted absence from the nook of my chest and shoulder where you fit perfectly.

I worry more when it’s you that makes the drive and I’ll admit that you travel more often and I am left to lose sleep in contemplation of days-and-nights gone by without you here with me in my bed. I can only hope for fifteen hour days of exhaustion when you’re not around so I may lie quietly, staring at the digital display of my alarm clock knowing that I won’t fall asleep.
Messy

I took the last cotton ball from your drawer
where you keep your things at my place.
I used it to tone my skin
with your astringent, cleaning my face temporarily with your texture.
I dare not use your other stuff—shave gel, smelling of lilac and something flowery, deo rant, strong enough for a man, clearly made for a woman,
a purplish-pink razor, and your toothbrush—actually, I’ve used that several times.
But those Orbit gum wrappers
I find all over my car—
in the door,
on and under the front seats
are different.
I caught you last time,
although in a cute way,
your sneakily subtle approach to dropping a wrapper in the ashtray as if to trade
for a quarter, nickel, or dime for coffee.
As if your stuff in the drawer doesn’t take up enough space, I found three of your Starbucks’ cups in my backseat.
The House on Saltaire

Tonight, like so many nights,
Cooush, I hear the sound,
the splash of the sea.
Salty transparent like the sweat that drips from my brow to lips.
“Kiss me, I’m not crying,” I call out.
No answers except the wind briskly blowing across the bay.
I imagine you would be as tearful as me, when the smell of untraveled places enters your nostrils
by means of the sunset wind.
It’s not painful or harsh like low tide,
I think, wiping my wind-induced tears, looking out towards Block Island and the Sound.
“You’re not far from there, a few miles or so from point to point,”
but the Whaler will not take me that far—not against the waves of a southeastern wind.
Tonight, like so many nights,
I’m not there,
I cannot be.
Montauk

For the first time in eleven days,
I lie alone in my bed
after having to press my clothes.
Tomorrow will come,
and for lunch I can only hope for some fresh Italian bread and cold cuts instead of heading over to East Lake Road to try that seafood place above the fish market raved about by the locals.
We watched the sun fall into the water—red and yellow extinguished behind the breakers—and we waved to the fishing boats returning from a long day.
Now only scenes of you and me remain:
walking down the pier
admiring boats we could only wish to afford—
I wonder if that one was really Billy Joel’s.
And what about that hundred-footer?
I can only imagine.
We sat poolside with drinks—yours a bay breeze, mine a rum and cola—and speculated who owned the white Bentley in the parking lot of the yacht club.
I still can’t believe that cars and boats that expensive just sit there in place all day.
The cork knocks of your espadrilles on the docks echo rhythm of these days gone by.
No more polo shirted, sunglass-tanned, flip-flop bliss, equidistant from tennis court and poolside bar.
Today vacation has ended;
tomorrow, our distance from one another returns as routine.
Without

I go out from time to time knowing that I will not see you leaned at the bar,
browsing songs on the jukebox, or outside having a smoke
and simple conversations.
Thanks to mobile phones
I may hear from you—
God-willing there is good service—as if satellites play a significant role in the night’s direction.

I visit the men’s room to have a chat
and with no one around, I attempt to rationalize with my reflection in the mirror in front of the urinals.
I realize it all becomes useless—my dry-cleaned button-downs, my matching brown shoes and belt, even that more-white-than-blue striped J-Crew shirt you bought me.

You know the one:
“It’s supposed to be wrinkled.”
Yes, that one.
I like it a lot by the way.

But it’s wasted,
unnecessary,
like each spray of Burberry cologne.
Although I love the fragrance, it is worthless as my Pure Sport deodorant, and my crew-neck t-shirts that hug my body
and appear pressed
when I’m without you.
It was yesterday that I sat beside you and beat you at a game of Scrabble over shared coffee and a piece of marble cake. When did it come into standard that I have to play by the rules while I watch you steal tiles and use the dictionary to find a word you’ve never heard before as if I’m not paying attention to your every move. It’s almost painful to let you “have the triple word score” and record only twelve points. I suppose it’s okay after all because you invited me to play. I won and I got to eat your cake. But as usual, you drank all but one sip of the coffee not because you didn’t want to share or because you felt bad that it started off as mine but mostly because you knew that there were crumbs of cake backwashed to the bottom of the mug like the Q you threw back into the bag for me to use. That’s okay because I like crumbs and all of this was quite delicious. Oh yes, you left me the Q. Q-U-I-P, triple word score, 45 Points.
Ullage

I can only hope for smooth sailing when I leave you behind in New York with the new puppy
and the hustle and bustle
of superficial competition.
Although it never is easy to leave,
once I hit Grand Central Parkway there’s no turning back—at least not this Sunday night.
It becomes hard to keep the car steady when the wind blows side to side one hand on the wheel
the other changing songs on the iPod, adjusting the volume and heat controls while also readily available to answer the phone in my lap—I keep it on vibrate
so I can feel you calling me.
Another week ends, another week a drone, in trance of anticipation for the next time we can play family again.
Our hectic parade,
a procession of short visits,
New York this weekend;
Providence the next,
as we continue our short visits to appease our hearts and our minds.
This mutual philanthropy—an effort to compensate for lost time and those Mondays to Fridays where we long for days closer together
and more mundane.
City Squirrels

As a cab nearly runs over a squirrel in the street near Central Park, I notice all the clusters of leaves strategically placed in the tree branches with the diligence of survival.
We too scurry around the city from place to place—Penn, maybe Grand Central, to the subway and through the streets to find a small Italian place on 57th.
We take a cab to cheat time to our reservations before the show and pass a homeless man building his nest for the night.
While we spoil ourselves, free to come and go
from the island to the city—he rushes to find and collect leaves, cardboard boxes, and plastic bags, forced to create refuge from refuse while we talk over dinner about design places for our second home.
Blocks away and hours earlier, the beats and bulls waved papers frenetically—some snatched, some crumbled, some fell to the floor—the mess of garbage created;
for some, savings lost;
for others, toilet paper gained.
Night Train

It’s not often that I ride the train into Manhattan by myself. Although the dulled blue and red seats, worn by time and its travelers, provide comfort, sinking with a familiar sound of air escaping through any holes or unstitched seams. I look around at the train’s inhabitants—good thing we are all headed to the same city, for the running lights above take their turn to shine. The posters are run down like dated drapes from your great-grandmother’s living room. This one here is for Mama Mia on Broadway, from two summers ago. The luggage racks are no more than twisted metal. The sways of the train take me side-to-side, shake me back to the sixth grade and the school bus which shook like a crackerjack box on wheels tossed along the road like the magazines, coffee cups, and flyers left behind on the floor of this train. And I will spend the rest of the ride trying to avoid the half eaten donut the man next to me has placed between us on the seat after pronouncing it “stale.” A pen rolls to my feet. It doesn’t write, it scratches. Screech, the train brakes and the yellow light above the door flashes as I hear the conductor’s voice, “Penn Station.”

Piece by Piece

Here we are in the failing nation where we are too proud to pay rent and not upper-middle enough to pay our way.
So we mortgage our lives piece by insignificant piece:
a car, a purse, clothing, and jewelry, a two hundred dollar wallet with not enough cash carried inside to purchase movie tickets, a tank of gas, a gallon of milk, a loaf of bread.
Hope comes in rumors of a tax refund to purchase instead of paying down maxed out credit cards or the principal of your mortgage.
Do what they tell you—
it’s good for the economy.
Short sell your house or they’ll foreclose.
You can always file for bankruptcy and have a shot at it all over again in ten years time your coveted credit will bounce back like the market.
At least that’s what they tell us.
What’s Left

Took a drive around the neighborhood,
I think it was Thursday.
I found no more milk containers on stoops, no newspapers in driveways, but foundations of homes and a broken alabaster lion—fragments of Greenlawn Avenue a couple of streets away.

Every time I drive around a dozen more houses are gone.
A year’s time will pass and the rest will be bought out, bulldozed over,
and left to decay and collect graffiti and idle brown-bag passersby—a neighborhood full of ruffians that drift around Winslow Park where kids used to ride their bikes and recreational leagues prized the fields as location for softball and soccer.

I suppose the Airport will take my street, my house, Jessica’s, and Dustin’s,
and soon,
the whole neighborhood.

Some would say
it’s probably for the better—despite the noise, the jet fuel pollutants, and increased traffic.
But I’ve lived here longer than anywhere else—
an eighth of a mile
from that runway.
Yard Debris Only

My hands rub against the bamboo rake, forming piles and blisters, while wind-chapped skin and a hangnail bitten too far down draw blood.
The smell of a dampened October afternoon averts me to childhood and being hit with a soccer ball in my venous chubby thigh.
While the chilled breeze of early November reminds me to leave the window open and not wear socks to bed so I may enjoy the cold sheets.
I wonder about the green sweatshirt
I used to wear as a young boy and why I chose to chew holes in the sleeves to stick my thumbs through.
Holes larger than one left by a rusty nail in just the right spot
so it disables wear for occasions outside yard work.
I watch the leaves fall in peanut brittle colors slow motion to the lawn.
The crumbling of dried leaves under fast moving cars on Main Avenue remind me of how quickly the workweek will pass.
And I will be here another weekend because Mr. Burnstein is too lazy a neighbor to care about the leaves being blown from his yard to mine.
Neighbors

There was always a better chance of hearing an argument than seeing a light shine from the house across the street.

Oftentimes there were angry voices yelling about money, the car payments, the cesspool, the mortgage, the pitbull chewing something up, again.

It was always later in the day that I would see her—her car, rather—and the garage door opening and her silver car entering the darkness that possessed that house.

At various times of the day I’d see his white van, a mobile advertisement for Bill’s Cleaning Company, parked in the drive, there in the morning and there at night.

I hope they went somewhere bright when they actually did leave; because for all the money I heard about, one of them should have seen some light.
Sage Drive

A candle burns with its flicker and flame in my mother-in-law’s suburban living room a little too close to a Raggedy Andy doll rested at the foot of an antique lamp complimented in color by its shade.
The dim room shades a polaroid, out of place and without frame, of the Virgin Mary’s reflection in some glass office building in Florida, I am told.
A Boyd’s Bear is there as well propped in a seated position—a thought of but not sought after collectible I am sure—
placed among knickknacks and nothings inside this cramped three-bed, two-bath with a finished basement on Sage Drive.
They park their cars against the grain here with no threat of a parking ticket, tow, or timed meter running out.
A phone rings, it’s Diane,
the neighborhood gossip queen, second marriage, stay-at-home mother of three,
spreading rumors of a break in on Brierbrook Avenue,
two streets away.
“Lock your doors,” she says,
“for the rest of the week anyhow.”
On Hedgerow Drive

I wonder if the birds came today.
Filled their bath last night after work and the feeder by the kitchen window early this morning.
I tend not to open the garage doors because it startles them.
Though they leave gifts of color on my car when it’s left in the driveway.
The spring will come soon and I’ll wake them on weekdays—stretching, chest forward, arms back, like the birds in the front garden.
While I have the luxury to shower or bathe, they rely on me for fresh water.
They test the water with their toes as clichéd cartoon humans do.
I’m sure the birds were here today, although I didn’t find them there by the blue and purple slate walkway or anywhere around this place that is not theirs nor quite my own.
In thirty years time,
the bank tells me this will all be mine.
But I’d rather have no responsibility and come and go on a summer breeze with the knowledge that I can always stop down and test the water.
House on Brightside Court

Oldest child, last one home,
I locked the door,
turned out the front light that brightens our three-step stoop and reaches and reveals the cracking concrete and decay of the driveway.

Little Alyssa wanted some water before bed,
so I turned to the fridge—
a week old, half-eaten rotisserie chicken, fat gelled over, better off in the freezer.
There’s plenty of ice when you’re not here and I don’t have to hear Mom bitch about you chowing it, the sound of your frustrations.
I turned off the maker this morning, good.

I went out to dinner again ‘cause you weren’t around to do whatever it is that you do since Mom works seventy hours.
I bought sugar today—
you know how she loves her coffee.
I set the automatic brewer for quarter of five in the morning.
I hope that’s early enough for her to fill her cup
before another twelve hour day to come home to TV and your snoring—morning comes quickly, sometimes four hours.
She’ll iron her scrubs and spray perfume to extinguish the decay that surrounds
this household
gone astray.
“I’m Catholic”

She had dyed black hair;
black surrounded the white polka dots on her oversized vinyl purse.

Alone she stood, while others sat, leaned on, and knelt below the church pews.
Her pale calf trumped her thin ankle as it disappeared into a silver dance flat leaving no clue as to what color her toenail polish was on Good Friday.

Supposedly devout male parishioners collected offerings—
their grandchildren play basketball in CYO recreation.
Members of the congregation softly placed coins in the velvet covered baskets;
the more they give, the more they care.
Not to be found out as cheapo or sinner, others offer the kind that folds.

Lines formed and I was told we were to go “venerate the crucifix,” and myself ignorant of where to kiss, in a hurry was humbled to kiss his feet.

Afterwards, I looked to find the girl in black—like me, younger, out of place, perhaps to joke about our cluelessness or maybe a vain inquiry on how many germs she thought were on that wooden whatchamacallit.
Olneyville Square

He stands in the August heat, bearded with clothes and a heavy coat, transferring change from a coffee cup into his pants pocket.
Around his neck, a cardboard sign made from a pizza box
and a nylon cord
from a bundle of newspapers reads “I NEED CHANGE,” in black marker.
Earlier in the morning,
I saw him reading the paper, sitting atop the stack from which it came,
as I waited for the pharmacy to open.
I followed him curiously to the stationary aisle where I saw him shove a Sharpie into his pocket so quickly, as not to be seen, that it ripped its seam.
Hours later, he paces frantically looking through his pockets to quiet his grumbling stomach or the voices inside his head, only to find a hole.
Sedation Dentistry

Take a Xanax,
a couple of milligrams—
There you are—
it will help you
relax.
Fall
while your eyelids
flutter.
I’ll put you under.
Personally,
I like the nitrous effect:
laugh, then sleep,
while I poke and prod.
My hands finding their way placing my implements aside.
Drift fingertips
up your skirt.
Need a little Astroglide—Vaseline will smell too obvious, afterward.
After all,
this is for my pleasure
at your expense.
Thursday, Post Road

A path cleared in the middle of a two-way street.
Cars pulled over on each side, forced to follow suit and stop,
I looked to the left and to the right.
There were no children
crossing with teacher, nor was there a pregnant woman
with toddler at her side, not even a boy scout helping a geriatric struggling with groceries trying to cross.
Just an obese lady riding a bike nearly in the middle of Post Road, listening to her iPod.
I began to feel bad for the bike seat but then I heard the screeching siren of the fire truck
that ran her over.
I pretended not to make eye contact with either of you at the bar.
It was nice to finally meet him face-to-face, isn’t that what I’m supposed to say?
You introduced us,
but I was fine not saying hello.
He and I had no genuine embrace, no friendly handshake, conversation, nor laughs, as if we were meant to be friends.
But I knew his face and name already from dance pictures hanging near your bed in your dorm room—
I felt he was watching me when I used to come on your bare breasts.
I reminded him that I knew who he was when I kissed you on the cheek, goodbye.
I shook his hand and another time it happened:
I’m just some nice guy you knew from undergrad that he has conveniently never heard about.
I’d almost rather that he knew that I fucked you
five years ago.
Bad Breath and Audacity

I saw a lunch aide from my elementary school at the local pharmacy the other night. We used to call her thunderthighs in the yard at recess. But that night, I was able to pass by her to get my toiletries. Surely I could’ve chosen another aisle.

She still has oversized glasses as uncool in ’93 as they are now. Her body is seamless, having no defined hips, stomach, ass, nor breasts; just a protruding bulge of sedentary lifestyle. She wasn’t as large as I recalled—it’s been over a decade since I saw her last.

I was ahead of her in line as I realized there were some spearmints to the left of me. I stepped out of line. I’ll admit I’ve called others out for doing so, But I stepped right back into line, still ahead of old thunderthighs. I bought my things and was on my way.

Out to the car now, I turn the key with my foot on gas and caught myself looking in the mirror, distracted. She stepped in front of my car.
